Customer Reviews

I just finished reading this book from cover to cover. My opinion, is that it's very well suited for 1102s with 3-5 years experience; especially if you work for an agency that does not a good mentoring program. The author closes many gaps by answering many the how and why questions mid-level acquisition professionals may have. The FAR tell you what you have to do, but it's often difficult to figure out what approach to take. While to author does not give step by step instructions, the samples included are sufficient to allow readers to develop their own structured approach to source selection. There are good samples throughout the book and in the appendix for preparing a number of key documents. I would not recommend it for those with less than the stated level of experience because many of the concepts covered may not make sense until readers have gone through the solicitation/source selection process. It needs to be updated because there have been several key FAR revisions since this was published, but the concepts still apply. It's also a good reference book to have in your acquisition library.

Good refresher for the procurement practitioner and good info for the business firm that is thinking of getting into the world of federal procurement. It is easily understandable and not written in 'federalees.' Would have liked more details on specifics of section L and M of the solicitation. Specifically, details on how to develop language. The information provided was not detailed enough for the procurement practitioner to apply.

Good book !

I teach seminars on Federal Source Selection to both government and industry folks and I found this book to be a must-have reference because of its readability and practical descriptions of the process, tips & techniques, and consequences of poor RFPs. I believe Ms Rumbaugh does an excellent job of detailing all the factors that must be considered in both writing and responding to a Federal government requirement and lays the foundation on which practitioners can use their best business judgement to produce a high quality product.
