Customer Reviews

"Noah's story of finding acceptance for chronic but invisible illness (here, migraines) goes beyond the canon of "useful books," and lands firmly in the category of warm stories about friendship." - Brian Lies, author and illustrator of the of the New York Times Bestselling Bats series. "Noah the Narwhal offers children a gentle lesson in compassion and understanding in relationships with others." - Mark Alan Stamaty, author of Who Needs Donuts?

Judith Klausner is a migrainey land mammal from Somerville, Massachusetts. She channels her experience of invisible disability (and everything else) into her creative endeavors. She often makes art using unusual materials from her surroundings, and plays with her food both recreationally and professionally. When not creating works of art, she likes to throw fancy dress tea parties. Seeing a lack of characters like herself in picture books, Judith set to work contributing to filling this void, and she hopes that Noah will help other disabled folks of all ages feel less isolated.

It was my privilege to view an advance copy of this charming book. I have several friends and relatives who have chronic conditions that sometimes make it hard for them to interact with my three young children, and this book was a perfect way to explain to my kids what was going on in an accessible way they could understand. This book is seriously a must-have for anyone who has children and needs to explain chronic invisible illness to them.
