Jamie Grady is a professor at Point Park University in Pittsburgh, where he teaches in the Sports, Arts, and Entertainment program. Prior to joining academia, Jamie served in a variety of positions for arts organizations throughout the east coast. He is a frequent contributor to professional journals and is the author of two Heinemann books, Actor Inc.: How to Get the Next Gig - and Still Pay the Rent (2007) and A Simple Statement: A Guide to Nonprofit Arts Management and Leadership (2006).

This is a very vague overview of starting and running a Nonprofit Art organizations. Though useful for all arts, the author specializes in Theatre in New York state and sometimes this is evident. Definitions of various players, such as the board of directors, and the role they play in the non profit are useful. This book is very short. It took me less than an hour to finish and I came away knowing more than I knew certainly but not enough to act. I'd consider it a primer on the topic, and further research will definitely be required.

That is why this book is great. It has a simple message that is more relevant than ever. Vision, mission and values must be baked in to a non-profit and all decisions and actions should flow from these. In today's arts nonprofit competition for funding, stable employment, divergent grant requirements and just overall fear has led to divergence from mission vision and values which has led to mediocrity and blandness in arts programming. This mediocrity exacerbates the problem. Professor Grady has the insight to know that leadership and excellence can't be taught in a how-to manual, following directions has never created leaders. Instead Professor Grady gives a basic foundation to direct leadership energy and is a welcome comrade in the fight for arts excellence.
